John H. Patterson’s Gift To City Will Soon Be Thrown Open For The Use Of Citizens

BY TODD LAMB, EDMUND MCDONALD

The Community Country Club and its nearly thirty hundred members will always be regarded as a testimonial to the generous feeling of John H. Patterson toward the latter city.

Not that there was wanting precedent evidence of the interest and sympathy of the community in the project, but with the completion of the work, the city has received a monument that will be a distinction which the community may well feel proud of.

If you stand on the brow of a neighboring hill, in the shadow of one of the magnificent courses which John H. Patterson, and take in every detail over this broad landscape, you are sure to come to the same slight conception of what this gift represents. You see the face of a magnificent and inspiring. As far as you can see, there is nothing but beauty and order and perfectly finished machinery, and all with the same beautiful balance and proportion of nature.

There is a wonderful nine-hole course to be turned into a 18-hole (range) golf course for those who enjoy the game in a more serious and better way. The three-lane tennis courts for those who delight in the turmeric and for those who enjoy the game, and the seven-miles-a-side horse walk are all matters of beauty and order.

The Community Country Club, which is the result of the planning work of John H. Patterson, should be a source of pride to every citizen of Dayton. It is the result of the planning work of John H. Patterson, and the work of the Community Country Club, who are the people of the city, and not of the city itself. It is the result of the planning work of John H. Patterson, and the work of the Community Country Club, who are the people of Dayton.

The Community Country Club, which is the result of the planning work of John H. Patterson, and the work of the Community Country Club, should be a source of pride to every citizen of Dayton. It is the result of the planning work of John H. Patterson, and the work of the Community Country Club, who are the people of Dayton.

John H. Patterson is the giver of the gift to Dayton. Let John H. Patterson answer the question in his own words, addressed to the people of Dayton, in the following words:

"The gift which is being given to the city is not a gift of money, but a gift of something far more valuable. It is a gift of the spirit of cooperation, of the spirit of friendship, of the spirit of service, of the spirit of Democracy. It is a gift of the spirit of the American people, of the spirit of the American way of life, of the spirit of the American tradition.

The gift which is being given to the city is not a gift of money, but a gift of something far more valuable. It is a gift of the spirit of cooperation, of the spirit of friendship, of the spirit of service, of the spirit of Democracy. It is a gift of the spirit of the American people, of the spirit of the American way of life, of the spirit of the American tradition.

"The gift which is being given to the city is not a gift of money, but a gift of something far more valuable. It is a gift of the spirit of cooperation, of the spirit of friendship, of the spirit of service, of the spirit of Democracy. It is a gift of the spirit of the American people, of the spirit of the American way of life, of the spirit of the American tradition."

(Continued on page 4)